Caption: Day 189 of How to Not Be a Psychopath

There’s a difference between being humble and making yourself smaller so other people don’t feel insecure.

A lot of people will call confidence arrogance when your confidence forces them to look at where they’ve settled.

That doesn’t mean you need to become a jerk. It means you need to stop apologizing for wanting a bigger life.

And if somebody consistently needs you to shrink so they can feel comfortable around you, they probably don’t need a smaller version of you.

They need less access to you.

STORED TRANSCRIPT

You don't need therapy. You just need to be more cocky. Honestly, just admit it. You want more out of life. You want more money, you want more love, you want more freedom, you want a bigger life, but somewhere along the way, small people around you convinced you that what you wanted was too much, that you're somehow being ungrateful. But here's the catch, the people who are living small want you to stay small so that they don't have to face the fact that they are too afraid to go after the bigger life that they also want. You're just the only one who has balls enough to admit it. And if somebody only likes you when you're small, you probably don't want to be around those people. The book today reminds us, identifying what we want and need, and then writing it down, sets in motion a powerful chain of events. And remember, it is impossible to build that big life by constantly making yourself smaller for other people. Today's reading is from The Language of Letting Go on how to not be a psychopath. Nobody's told you this today. I love you, I believe in you. If you want to do hard things, you can do hard things. You got this. Come back tomorrow, so we can all be a little less crazy together. Now if you all don't mind, I got to go play in this New York trip. I love y'all. See y'all tomorrow. Peace.
