If you have no purpose, you will obsess over women. You wake up thinking about her. You check your phone all the time, hoping that she texted you. You analyze her tone, her distance, her attention. So she becomes the mission. Her validation becomes your reward. Her mood starts controlling your mood. And when she finally pulls away, your entire world feels like it is falling apart. And that's the problem. The only reason I know this is because I did this multiple times. After my last heavy breakup four years ago with the woman who I introduced as my future wife, and the future mother of my children, to my best friends back home, I realized that I had completely lost my purpose. She had become my purpose. And I read this book called The Way of the Superior Man by David Deida, and one of the very first lines in the book, as soon as I cracked it open, said, "Men, if you don't have a purpose, close this book and go find your purpose, because nothing that I tell you is going to matter unless you have a mission that you need to accomplish in this life." Those first few lines changed my life. I went on a mission for a year plus. I wasn't working. I was figuring out who I was, what my mission was on this planet during this lifetime, and I have rebuilt my entire life. Four years later, I am now living a more purposeful life than I have ever lived in the previous 36 years of my life. I feel more motivated, more confident. I feel like the best version of myself that I have ever been, because of those lines that I read in that book. So I will leave you with this: A woman can be a part of your life, but she cannot be the reason you have one. I love y'all. Peace.
