Caption: The ceiling on videography is low in my opinion.

The ceiling on strategy is nonexistent.

Most creatives never make the jump because they don't realize that the camera was never the destination.

It was just the door.

The natural progression of a videographer shouldn't be "Yo, let me buy more gear."

It should be better thinking.

When you can strategize and execute the strategy, that check starts to look different!

Videography is a gateway drug. I mean that in the best way possible. When you pick up a camera and get really good at capturing people, capturing moments, capturing the feeling of a brand, something starts to happen that you never get really any warning for, right? You start to see things differently. Like, if you shoot real estate, you stop seeing a building, and like you start seeing what it should be called. If you shoot restaurants, you know, you stop just seeing the food, and you start asking what the next restaurant concept should be built around. When you get to that point as a videographer, you're not just a videographer anymore. That's creative direction, that's brand strategy, that's a completely different conversation and a completely different invoice. I started off shooting real estate videos and doing real estate photography, just trying to, you know, make make some money. And doing that over and over, understanding what buyers feel, what developers dream about, I got to the point where I started creative directing entire development projects, naming them, designing the identity from the ground up. So, the camera didn't just make me a better videographer, it made me a better thinker. The camera is not the destination, it's just the door, and once you walk through that door, there's no ceiling on where you could go.
